Emergence and Evolution of the Métis Nation

People of mixed ancestry appeared in eastern Canada soon after initial contact between Indians and Europeans.

With large-scale European immigration and agricultural settlement in eastern Canada, these people of mixed ancestry were generally absorbed into the settler or Indian populations.

It was on the isolated plains of western North America during the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries that people of mixed ancestry emerged as a new and distinct people and nation.

The fur trade companies operating in this territory - the Hudson's Bay Company and the North West Company - had a common interest in blocking agricultural settlement and large-scale immigration onto the western plains from the British colonies to the east.

Hence, the mixed offspring of French fur traders from the North West Company or Scottish fur traders from the Hudson's Bay Company and their Cree, Ojibwe, or Dene wives formed an ever-increasing proportion of the fur trade population.

As the numbers of the mixed offspring grew and married among themselves, they developed a new culture, neither European nor Indian, but a fusion of the two.

Thus, the Métis people emerged.

Their Michif language mixed the French, Cree, and Ojibwe languages.

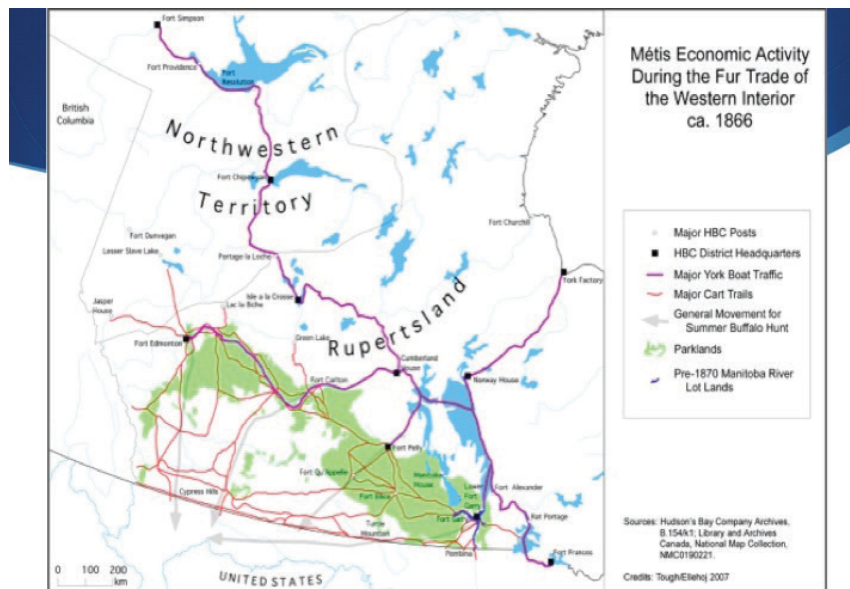

Their dance form combined the reels of Scotland with the intricate steps of Plains Indians.

Their dress, as can be seen in this photo, was semi-European, semi-Indian in style but of European cut and was often decorated with glass beads and quills.

With their newly emerged traditions and command of both European and Indian languages, the Métis were logical intermediaries in the commercial relationship between the two civilizations.

They adapted European technology to the wilderness through innovations such as the Red River cart and York boat, which made possible the transport of large volumes of goods and supplies across the west to and from the far-flung outposts of the fur trade.

By the early 19th century the Métis had developed a distinct political consciousness that enabled them to challenge the authority of the dominant fur trade company, the Hudson's Bay Company.

In 1811, the Hudson's Bay Company made a land grant to Lord Selkirk of 116,000 square miles including the Red River Valley for an agricultural settlement and a source of provisions for the fur trade.

Efforts by the new colonists to restrict the Métis hunting and trading practices eventually led to the colonists' defeat in 1816 at the Battle of Seven Oaks, where the victorious Métis led by Cuthbert Grant, Jr. unfurled the flag of the Métis Nation.

In 1821, amalgamation of the Hudson's Bay Company and the North West Company closed many fur trade posts and forced their Métis employees and families to move to the Red River Settlement.

Cuthbert Grant

This concentration in the Red River Settlement of French Catholic Métis from the old North West Company posts and English Protestant Métis from the Hudson's Bay Company posts heightened the group consciousness of the Métis.

Ties between the two groups were reinforced by frequent intermarriage and common economic pursuits in the fur trade economy as boatmen, freighters, guides, interpreters, merchants and provisioners of food through the buffalo hunt and farming.

The Hudson's Bay Company authorities had to take this group consciousness into account in their administration of the Red River Settlement.

Métis Nation Flag

Métis free traders and merchants became the most articulate proponents of a growing Métis nationalism and repeatedly challenged the Hudson's Bay Company monopoly.

In 1867 the four provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick joined together to form Canada through the Constitution Act 1867 which by sections 91 and 92 set out a division of powers between the federal (s.91) and the provincial (s.92) governments.

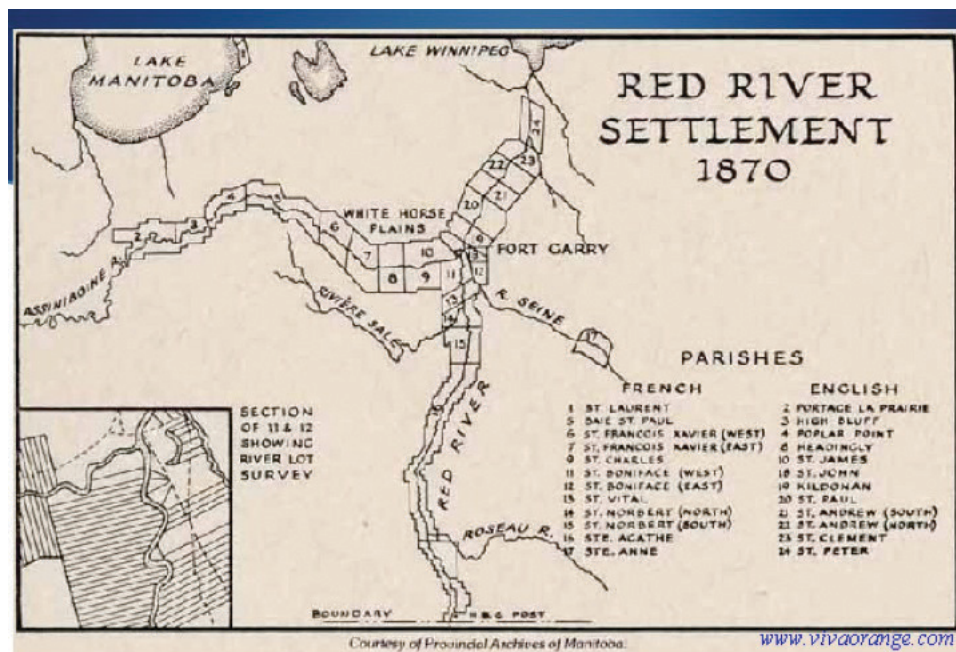

The federal government under s.91(24) had the jurisdiction or authority to deal with “Indians and the lands reserved for the Indians”.

By s.146, the Constitution also made provision for the entry of Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territory to join Confederation.

Red River served as an incubator of the new nation and Métis nationalism.

By 1869, the population of the Red River Settlement - one of the largest settlements on the plains of North America west of the Mississippi and north of the Missouri - consisted of 9,800 Métis and 1,600 whites.

In 1869, the Hudson's Bay Company sold Rupert's Land to the Dominion of Canada without any provision for the rights of the Métis majority in the Red River Settlement that was expected to become part of a territory governed directly by Ottawa.

In advance of the formal transfer of authority, Prime Minister Sir John A. Macdonald sent a survey party to Red River.

In the fall of 1869, a group of Métis including their emerging leader Louis Riel disrupted the survey party.

They formed a Métis National Committee and informed the authorities that Macdonald's lieutenant governor-designate would be admitted into Red River only after Canada negotiated terms with the Métis Nation.

A Métis force under the command of Ambroise Lépine turned back Macdonald's representatives near the American border while another group of up to 400 Métis led by Riel occupied Fort Garry without bloodshed.

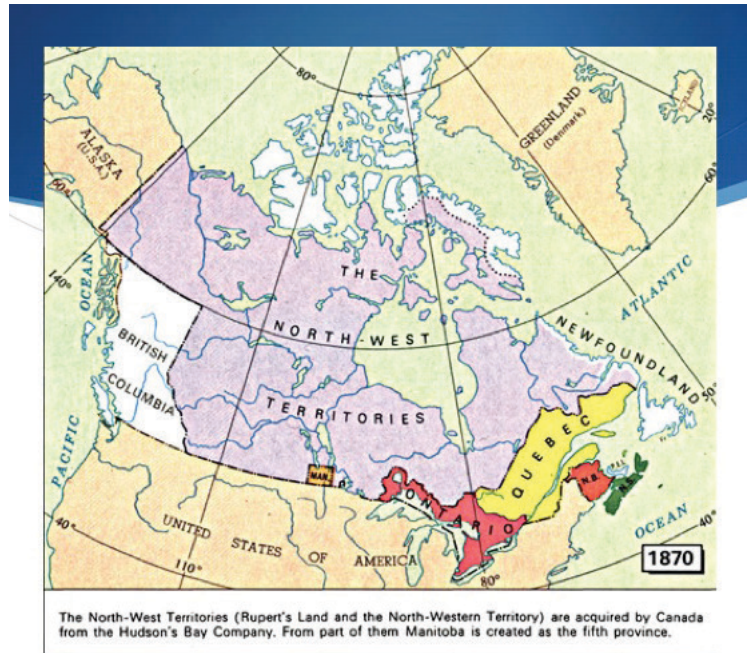

The Métis Nation formed a provisional government under the leadership of its president, Louis Riel, to draft a List of Rights for the Métis.

Provisional Government of the Métis Nation,

This list would be carried to Ottawa by three delegates of the provisional government and would form the basis of negotiations with the Conservative government of Sir John A. Macdonald.

These negotiations resulted in federal legislation, the Manitoba Act 1870 by which the Red River Settlement would enter Confederation as Canada's fifth province, with English and French as the official languages of the new province. It also made possible the entry of the rest of the Métis Nation homeland through the Rupert's Land Order 1870 which provided further protections for the Métis Nation.

Unlike the four provinces at the time of Confederation, however, Manitoba would not have control over its public lands.

Macdonald insisted on dominion control of Manitoba's public lands but agreed to compensate the Métis in the new province in order to annex the Northwest peacefully.

Section 31 of the Manitoba Act provided for a 1.4 million acres for the children of the Métis heads of families while section 32 confirmed the land titles of all existing settlers in the province who had interests in land, the majority being Métis.

The Métis believed they had a deal but shortly after the Manitoba Act was passed, Macdonald dispatched 1,200 troops to Fort Garry, today's Winnipeg.

Troops and settlers arriving in the new province were hostile to the Métis, some of whom were killed, raped or beaten. Métis landholders were harassed. This period has been referred to as "a reign of terror" by some historians.

Despite government assurance of amnesty to all participants in the Red River Resistance, Riel was forced to flee for his life. Three times elected to the House of Commons, he would be barred from ever taking his seat.

A process for distributing lands to the Métis in fulfillment of section 31, originally envisaged by the first Lt. Governor to take a year to complete, would take more than a decade for the federal government to administer.

During this period, confronted by a mass influx of hostile Anglo-Ontarians frequently squatting on and gaining title to their traditional lands caught up in the red tape of Ottawa's chaotic land grant scheme, many Métis moved on.

Their proportion of Manitoba's population dropped from 83% in 1870 to 7% percent in 1886. Two-thirds of the Métis people moved out of the Province of Manitoba, most between 1876 and 1884.

Some Red River Métis moved to the north or into the United States, but most moved west to the Qu'Appelle and South Saskatchewan River Valleys and to the settlements near Fort Edmonton, where they joined or founded new Métis villages.

Gabriel Dumont

There they resumed their demands for a land base in unison with those Métis resident in the Northwest before 1870.

As early as 1872, the Saskatchewan Métis under the leadership of Gabriel Dumont had petitioned Ottawa for title to their lands.

Their calls went unheeded until 1879 when Parliament amended the Dominion Lands Act that provided for the granting of land to the Métis of the Northwest, yet it was not until January 28, 1885, that the Macdonald government established a commission to review and settle Métis claims in the Northwest.

By then, the Métis of the Saskatchewan Valley had already organized for the second resistance against Ottawa.

In June 1884, they had sent a delegation to Montana to persuade exiled leader, Louis Riel to return to the Northwest and on March 19, 1885, under the leadership of Riel, the Métis formed the 2nd Provisional Government of the Métis Nation.

As in 1869–70, they demanded responsible government, parliamentary representation, and local control of public lands, as well as confirmation of land titles according to the river lot system of survey.

On March 26, 1885, fighting broke out at Duck Lake, where Gabriel Dumont and the Métis clashed with the North West Mounted Police, prompting the federal government to dispatch a military expedition under the command of Major General Frederick Middleton.

Battle of Batoche, 1885

On April 24, Dumont ambushed Middleton's column at Fish Creek.

Between May 9 and 12, Middleton's army defeated the Métis in the Battle of Batoche.

∞ Métis Council, August 1885

A few days later Riel surrendered and was transported to Regina for trial. On August 1st, he was found guilty of high treason and was hanged on November 16, 1885.

The members of Riel's second provisional government were photographed in chains outside the Regina courthouse.

The trial and execution of Riel created Canada's first national unity crisis: Ontario, demanding the execution of Riel; Quebec, in support of the defender of the French language and Catholic faith in the west, demanding clemency.

Macdonald's refusal to commute the death sentence, his infamous "Riel shall hang though every dog in Quebec bark in his favor", and the execution itself led to massive street protests in Montreal.

It was only after the armed conflict in the Northwest had begun that the Macdonald government adopted orders-in-council for federal Half-Breed commissions to distribute Métis grants under the Dominion Lands Act.

Scrip Commission at Devil's Lake, 1900

denominated in a fixed amount of acres or dollars that could be applied to the purchase of surveyed dominion lands opened for homesteading.

Land scrip was non-transferable, but the process for redeeming it for land proved to be complicated and lengthy. Métis claimants had to travel to distant dominion lands offices to locate the land scrip on a dominion lands entry and then wait for the patent to be issued by Ottawa.

Métis from large areas of the Northwest that had not yet been surveyed could not use land

These federal commissions would extend grants to Métis throughout the Northwest. Starting with the signing of Treaty Eight in 1899, the Treaty commissions would sit simultaneously as Half-Breed commissions, that is, the one commission would deal with both Treaty negotiations and the distribution of Half-Breed scrip.

Grants under the Dominion Lands Act took the form of scrip, a coupon or money scrip to obtain title to their traditional lands.

The most common form of grant issued by the Half-Breed commissions was transferable money scrip which could be applied to the purchase of dominion lands or sold and assigned to land speculators, often lawyers and bankers, who were equipped to go through the onerous redemption process.

Most Métis opted for money scrip and then sold it for a fraction of its value to scrip speculators.

Ottawa's collusion with speculators extended to every step of the scrip distribution and redemption process.

Scrip speculators travelled with and, in effect, became an integral part of the Half-Breed commissions.

The scrip system was rife with fraud and the Supreme Court of Canada itself in the 2003 Blais case has described it as “a sorry chapter” in Canadian history.

Without title to their land and facing a rapid decline of the fur trade economy, the Métis of the Northwest were swept away by a tide of immigration in the decades following the Northwest Resistance of 1885.

Some moved to the northern forests of the Prairies, where they joined established Métis settlements or formed new ones. There they were able to continue their traditional pursuits of freighting, trapping, hunting, and fishing.

In the southern part of the Prairies, some of the Métis managed to cling to their lands and earned a livelihood as farmers and farm labourers.

Many others were forced into slums on the fringes of Indian reserves and white communities or on road allowances, strips of public land on either side of public roads. They eked out a subsistence gathering buffalo bones for shipment to fertilizer factories, picking stones on farms, doing other menial jobs, hunting and fishing, or getting by on relief (that era's version of today's welfare or social assistance).

With its transfer of public lands and natural resources to the provincial governments on the Prairies in 1930, the federal government absolved itself of any further responsibility for the Métis.

Despite its recognition of Métis land rights in the original "postage stamp" province of Manitoba and then, by the Dominion Lands Act, in the rest of the Prairies, Northeastern BC and the Northwest Territories, the federal government in 1981 maintained that Métis land rights had been extinguished by law and that any future interventions on their behalf would have to come from the provinces.

This denial of federal responsibility extended far beyond the question of formal jurisdiction.

Métis history and culture were kept out of national museums and galleries and ignored in cultural policies.

In 1941, the Métis were removed as a distinct people in Canada's census.

Annual march to the mass gravesite

The Métis endured decades of state-sponsored marginalization.

Riel's vision of a re-born Métis Nation would blur, but never die.

Predominantly Métis communities, Métis historical and cultural societies, and Métis political associations throughout the dark period of the Métis diaspora would preserve the history, culture, Michif language, traditions and political objectives of the new nation.

∞ Founders of Métis Association of Alberta 1928

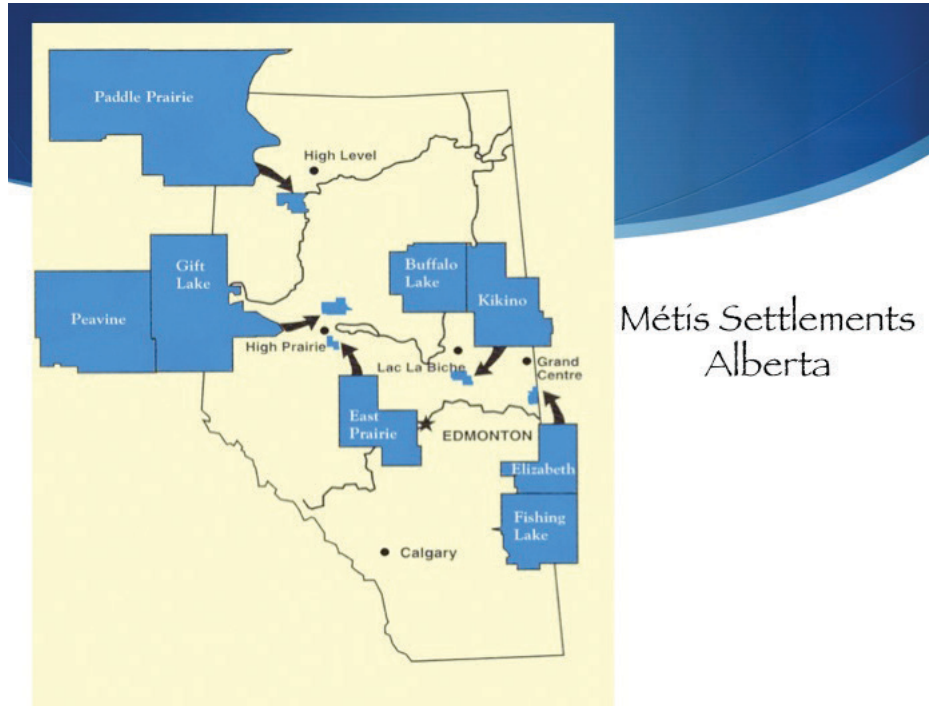

In 1887, Métis at Batoche, Saskatchewan, organized a society named after their patron saint, Joseph, with objectives similar to those of Quebec's St. Jean Baptiste Society. About this time, Métis people began annual observances of the resistance at Batoche that continue to this day.

Also in 1887, a group of Métis nationalists met in St. Vital, Manitoba, to found a historical and cultural society. Incorporated on March 1, 1888, l'Union Nationale Métisse Saint Joseph du Manitoba was, and to this day remains, committed to fostering an awareness of the historical contributions of the Métis in Manitoba.

During the Depression of the 1930s, dire conditions on the Prairies provoked a political mobilization of the Métis.

Plowing land on one of the Métis Settlements

Founded in 1928, the Métis Association of Alberta in 1934, pressured the United Farmers of Alberta government into appointing a royal commission to inquire into the conditions of the Métis.

Following the recommendations of the Alberta Half-Breed Commission Report, the province enacted the Métis Population Betterment Act in 1938 to provide for the establishment of Métis settlement associations that would receive land from the province.

∞ Founders of Saskatchewan Métis Society,

Twelve settlement areas were set aside in the 1940s, but the province later terminated four unilaterally and relocated their populations.

Today there are eight Métis settlements in Alberta comprising a landmass of 1.28 million acres.

Founded in 1937, the Saskatchewan Métis Society sought provincial assistance in directing its “constitutional claims” against the Government of Canada, which it held responsible for the historical dispossession of the Métis.

By the 1940s, twelve townships of public lands had been set aside for the Green Lake Métis Settlement in northwestern Saskatchewan and the CCF provincial government established a number of Métis farms across southern Saskatchewan.

The outbreak of the Second World War derailed efforts to resolve the historical and constitutional claims of the Métis as many of the leaders of Métis associations such as Malcolm Norris, a founder of the Métis Association of Alberta seen in the photo above, joined the war effort.

During the 1960s, a new set of circumstances caused a revival of Métis political consciousness and organization. With the liberalization of North American society, minorities began to assert their identities. Among them were the Métis.

The upsurge of nationalism in Quebec during this period also played a role in Métis political revival as many Métis believed that, as a founding people, they had as much a right to special status as Quebec.

The 1960s witnessed the reorganization of older Métis associations and the formation of new ones.

In 1970, the Trudeau government agreed to fund Aboriginal organizations. Three national associations were recognized, along with their affiliated associations. Status Indians formed the National Indian Brotherhood (now the Assembly of First Nations) while the Inuit formed the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada (now the Inuit Tapiritt Kanatami).

Ottawa also offered funds to the existing Métis associations on the Prairies which formed a national association, the Native Council of Canada (now the Congress of Aboriginal Peoples).

During this period, the Métis entered into a marriage of convenience with the non-status Indians.

Despite their fundamental differences in history, culture, and political aspirations - the Métis seeking recognition as a distinct people and nation and the non-status Indians seeking re-instatement to Indian status - the two groups found themselves in much the same relationship with the federal government.

Ottawa's jurisdictional position was that both peoples were a provincial responsibility unlike status Indians and Inuit for whom the federal government had exercised its constitutional responsibility.

For the Inuit this occurred after the 1939 Re Eskimos case where-in the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that the Inuit fell within the term "Indians" in s.91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

Under its "Just Society" programs, the Trudeau regime was willing to work with the Native Council of Canada's constituencies to improve conditions, albeit as Aboriginal minorities with "special problems" rather than "special rights".

Toward this end, the federal government found it convenient to group the Métis and non-status Indians together for service delivery purposes.

During the 1970s, the Native Council of Canada expanded from its Prairie Métis base to take in new, predominantly non-status Indian associations from the other provinces and territories.

In the wake of the Calder decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in 1973, the federal government, under its “land claims” policy, offered funds for Métis and non-status Indians to research their land claims to determine if any of Ottawa’s obligations remained outstanding.

The land claims research campaign in the 1970s raised the political consciousness of the Métis and made them aware of their historical nationhood.

It also brought out the significant differences in the claims and aspirations of the two constituencies of the Native Council of Canada: Métis claims directed toward the restoration of a land base and self-government for the Métis as a distinct nation; and non-status Indian claims to rejoin First Nation communities through regaining status under the Indian Act.

The Trudeau government’s campaign to patriate the constitution from the British Parliament, with a Charter of Rights, was a further catalyst for the Métis nationalist movement.

Harry Daniels, the Métis president of the Native Council in 1981, was instrumental in ensuring that the Aboriginal rights clause in the patriation bill adopted on January 30, 1981 was expanded to include a specific identification of the three Aboriginal peoples: Indians, Inuit and Métis.

Despite this important breakthrough in constitutional recognition, the federal government in March 1981 rejected Métis land claims.

Harry Daniels 2nd to right in constitutional negotiations, 1981

With the exception of the Métis in the Northwest Territories, it continued to exclude the Métis Nation from its land claims resolution processes, as it does to this day.

Fueled by this federal position, the Manitoba Métis Federation immediately launched a major land claims lawsuit against the federal government and the government of Manitoba, seeking a court declaration that these governments had breached their constitutional obligation under the Manitoba Act to provide the Métis with a land base.

Despite Ottawa's 1981 legal position on Métis land claims, the Métis leadership on the prairies saw an opportunity to negotiate a land base and self-government through the Constitution Act, 1982 that provided for a constitutional conference to identify and define the rights of Aboriginal peoples to be included in the Constitution.

Prime Minister Trudeau and Clément Chartier, 1983

The problem was that the prairie Métis associations were vastly outnumbered within the Native Council of Canada by non-status Indian organizations which sought to use the Council's seats at the constitutional conference to pursue their aspirations.

Failure to reach an accommodation on representation led to the Prairie Métis associations withdrawing from the Native Council in early March 1983 and forming the Métis National Council on March 8, 1983 in Regina, Saskatchewan as the vehicle for Métis nationalism.

The fledgling Métis National Council immediately launched a court case against Prime Minister Trudeau, forcing him to accede to the seating of the MNC at the March 15 and 16, 1983 constitutional conference and restoring the issues of a Métis land base and self-government to the constitutional agenda.

The MNC pressed the case for a Métis land base and self-government during the four First Ministers' Conferences on the Rights of Aboriginal Peoples from 1983 to 1987 but these conferences resulted in impasse.

It appeared that the impasse could be broken in October 1991 when Prime Minister Mulroney recognized the Métis Nation and sought our participation in the "Canada Round" of constitutional consultations.

On March 10, 1992, Parliament unanimously passed a resolution recognizing the unique and historic role of Louis Riel as a founder of Manitoba and supporting the attainment of the constitutional rights of the Métis people.

The Charlottetown Accord and a companion document, the Métis Nation Accord, appeared to represent a major breakthrough.

The Charlottetown Accord provided for a constitutional amendment to s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act 1867 making explicit federal jurisdiction for all Aboriginal peoples.

Prime Minister Mulroney and the MNC delegation at 1992 Charlottetown Conference

The Métis Nation Accord committed the federal government and the five westernmost Provinces to negotiate a land base and self-government with the Métis National Council and its provincial affiliates or Governing Members which by then included the original three prairie founders of the MNC and new affiliates from that part of our historic homeland in northeastern BC and northwestern Ontario.

The defeat of the Charlottetown Accord in the national referendum in October 1992 dashed our hopes for a negotiated settlement of our outstanding rights and forced us into the courts.

Facing repeated procedural delays by the federal government, the Manitoba Métis land claims lawsuit launched more than a decade earlier continued to wind its way through the courts.

In 1994, the Métis National Council, the Métis Nation – Saskatchewan and the Locals and Elders of northwest Saskatchewan filed a Statement of Claim in the Court of Queen’s Bench regarding the unfulfilled land grants promised under the Dominion Lands Act in order to open the door to similar claims and litigation across our historic homeland in western Canada where scrip was issued.

The decade also saw a Métis hunting rights case in northern Ontario move through the courts – the Powley case.

This case would culminate in the landmark decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in 2003, establishing that the Métis are a full-fledged rights-bearing Aboriginal people with constitutionally protected harvesting rights.

Tony Belcourt, Jean Teillet, and Steve Powley

It also established a test of objectively verifiable criteria for membership in a Métis rights-bearing community that was remarkably similar to the National Definition of Métis adopted earlier by the Métis National Council General Assembly in 2002.

According to this National Definition, a Métis is a person who self-identifies as such, is of historic Métis Nation ancestry, is accepted by the historic Métis Nation, and is distinct from other Aboriginal people.

In its Powley decision, the Supreme Court basically concurred with us, ruling that being of mixed European and Indian ancestry did not in itself make one Métis; in addition, the Court ruled, one had to prove an ancestral connection to, and acceptance by, historical Métis communities.

The Supreme Court in Powley also required governments to provide resources to Métis organizations to identify their rights-bearing members.

This led to federal support for the MNC's five Governing Members to establish membership or citizenship registries based on the MNC's National Definition of Métis.

These registries are an integral part of the governance system of the MNC's Governing Members that has been expanding steadily since the MNC's formation.

In 2011, the Supreme Court of Canada in the Cunningham case also confirmed that the Métis Nation has the right to determine its own citizenship, and that the Métis emerged “mainly on the Canadian plains, which now form part of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta”.

In this connection, the MNC General Assembly in March 2013 adopted a homeland resolution in which the Métis Nation leadership confirmed that there is only one Métis Nation which was part of the Northwest in 1867 and in today’s reality, its traditional homeland coincides with the three prairie provinces and “extends into the contiguous parts of British Columbia, Ontario, the Northwest Territories and the United States”.

Métis provincial organizations have established a distinct system of democratic accountability through province-wide ballot box election of leaders.

They have also established a very successful track record in the administration and delivery of government services such as housing, employment and training, economic development, and child and family services.

These programs have been delivered through professionally managed, arms-length institutions that are accountable to the elected representatives of the Métis people.

Although Métis are still excluded from federal Aboriginal education and health care benefits, the MNC’s Governing Members have managed to partially address the needs of our people through facilities such as Métis Nation endowments that provide our students with scholarships for post-secondary education.

At the same time, while the Métis organizations have been called on to serve as governments, they are constantly challenged by the lack of legal authority and reliable financing that will enable them to fulfill this mandate.

The Kelowna Accord in 2005 under the leadership of Prime Minister Martin had great potential to strengthen the capacity of the MNC and its Governing Members toward reducing the gaps in education, health, housing and infrastructure, and employment but this Accord would never see the light of day following the defeat of the Martin government a few months later.

The Métis National Council and the Government of Canada under Prime Minister Harper concluded a Métis Nation Protocol in 2008, which was renewed in 2013.

Under the Protocol, the MNC worked with the federal Minister of Aboriginal Affairs and his counterparts from the five westernmost provinces and industry to develop a strategy for promoting greater and more effective Métis participation in economic development.

This work resulted in a series of significant federal and provincial investments in Métis Nation financial institutions providing loan and equity capital to Métis entrepreneurs.

Under the Métis Nation Protocol, two Canada-MNC accords, one on governance and financing and the other on economic development, were concluded to strengthen the governance capacity of the Métis Nation to administer and deliver important services such as economic development.

The MNC's ultimate objective is to achieve a self-government agreement with reliable government-to-government financing arrangements.

Toward that end, the MNC is working on a Métis Nation Constitution that will define the nature of Métis government that will exercise powers under a self-government agreement.

This agreement could be put into effect through federal legislation, a Canada - Métis Nation Relations Act.

There are two principal ways to achieve a self-government agreement: the first through a political process; and the second through court action that would require Ottawa to conclude a contemporary land claims agreement including self-government arrangements with the Métis Nation.

Experience has shown that, without a mechanism forcing it to act, such as a declaration of the court, the federal government is unlikely to move on its own.

Nevertheless, hopes for a non-litigation solution were raised with the federal government moving toward revision of its comprehensive land claims policy, taking into account the need to achieve reconciliation with Aboriginal peoples and their Aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed under s.35 of the Constitution.

On December 13, 2011, the Supreme Court of Canada finally heard the case of the MNC's Manitoba Governing Member: Manitoba Metis Federation v Canada and Manitoba.

This marked the culmination of a thirty year battle in the courts to seek justice for the unfulfilled Métis land grants promised by the Manitoba Act 1870, itself a result of negotiations between the Métis Provisional Government of Louis Riel and the federal government of Sir John A. Macdonald.

The decision was finally delivered on March 8, 2013, 32 years after its launch, and 30 years to the very day of the formation of the MNC. It was a resounding victory for the MMF and for the Métis Nation. The SCC ruled that s. 31 of the Manitoba Act, 1870, was a solemn constitutional obligation on the part of Canada to the Métis people of the Red River Settlement and issued a declaration that the federal Crown had failed to implement s.31 in accordance with the Honour of the Crown.

Supreme Court of Canada, December 13, 2011

On April 17, 2014, the Federal Court of Appeal in the Daniels case confirmed the MNC's longstanding position that the federal government has constitutional responsibility to deal with the Métis under section 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. The decision was appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada.

announced the appointment of Mr. Tom Isaac as the Ministerial Special Representative (MSR) on Métis reconciliation.

The MSR's dual mandate was to address a reconciliation process that addresses Métis section 35(1) rights and establishes a framework for negotiations with the Manitoba Métis Federation to respond to the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Manitoba Métis Federation v. Canada, 2013.

The victory of Justin Trudeau's Liberal Party in the federal election on October 19, 2015, marked the beginning of an important new era in Canada-Métis Nation relations based on a new Nation-to-Nation relationship to further Métis self-government.

The Liberals had committed to negotiate with the Manitoba Métis Federation a settlement of the outstanding land claim ruled on by the SCC in 2013, to establish a federal claims process to reconcile Métis rights protected by section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, and to make specific investments in Métis Nation skills development and economic development institutions.

The new Trudeau government entered into preliminary talks with the MMF in December 2015. Newly appointed Minister of Indigenous and Northern Affairs, Carolyn Bennett, renewed the mandate of Ministerial Special Representative Tom Isaac to recommend a framework for a reconciliation process on Métis Nation s.35 rights. In Budget 2016, the federal government allocated $25 million for the development of a Métis Nation Economic Development Strategy.

On April 14, 2016, the Supreme Court of Canada in the Daniels case confirmed that the federal government has jurisdiction to deal with the Métis under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867, and reaffirmed the Powley test for determining access to Métis s. 35 rights.

On May 10, 2016, Indigenous Affairs Minister Bennett informed the United Nations that Canada was committing to full adoption of the UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples and to its implementation to be done in full partnership with First Nations, the Métis Nation and Inuit Peoples.

Manitoba Metis Federation President David Chartrand with Indigenous and Northern Affairs Canada Minister Carolyn Bennett

On July 21, 2016, A Matter of National and Constitutional Import: Report of the Minister's Special Representative on Reconciliation with Métis (Section 35 Métis Rights and the Manitoba Metis Federation Decision) is released by the Minister of Indigenous Affairs in Ottawa. MSR Tom Isaac recommends a sweeping overhaul of the relationship between Canada and the Métis Nation.

On November 15, 2016 Canada and the MMF signed a Framework Agreement to shape formal negotiation of a settlement of the historic Métis land claim in Manitoba. The Trudeau government will also establish section 35 rights and self-government tables with other Governing Members.

On April 13, 2017, Prime Minister Trudeau, President Chartier, and Governing Member Presidents signed the Canada-Métis Nation Accord during the first Métis Nation-Crown Summit in Ottawa. The Accord establishes a Permanent Bilateral Mechanism for the parties to pursue joint policy and program development for Métis Nation priorities.

On June 21, 2017 Prime Minister Trudeau announces transfer of former U.S. Embassy building facing House of Commons to First Nations, Métis Nation and Inuit.

On September 21, 2017, Métis Nation leaders and federal Ministers hold first of regular meetings under Canada-Métis Nation Accord and move toward agreements on training and employment, housing and early learning and child care.

Federal Budgets 2018 and 2019 include more than $2 billion in Métis Nation investments negotiated under the Canada-Métis Nation Accord in areas such as training and employment, housing, early learning and child care, post-secondary education, and economic development. Regular meetings with federal Ministers and annual Crown-Métis Nation Summits with the Prime Minister lead to co-development of policies and programs to reduce socio-economic gaps and enhance quality of life for Métis people.

Métis Nation honors veterans of Second World War including the payment of compensation from the $30-million Métis Veterans Recognition Payment Agreement concluded at the 2019 Crown-Métis Nation Summit.

Political and legal processes continue to enhance prospects for Métis rights recognition but regardless of their outcome, the struggle of the Métis people to realize our place as a founding nation in the Canadian federation will continue.
